Excerpt: . . . 9 tiative and REAL ID have been flawed programs, however, despite their worthy goals. In the case of the WHTI, the Department of Homeland Security has not been sufficiently attuned to how important cross-border travel is to the everyday lives of those who live in border commu-nities. In the case of REAL ID, the Department has not yet re-solved longstanding privacy and funding concerns. Meeting the challenge of securing the homeland requires that our borders be closed to our enemies but open to our friends. Along the Northern border, and in Maine in particular, that principle has special meaning. Our Nations border with Canada has long been criss-crossed with the strands of kinship, friendship, commerce, health care, and other shared activities. Border crossings are a rou-tine part of daily life in the cities and towns along our borders and they are vital to the economies of communities on both sides of the border. The Aroostook Valley Country Club in Northern Maine is a...
