The occurrence of both types of apatite demonstrates that the phosphate pellets are not principally of fecal origin. The residual zone underlying the Bone Valley is characterized by rapid alternations of quiet-water sedimentation and turbulent reworking. The immaturity of first-cycle elastics derived from this littoral environment suggests that the well-rounded pellets that occur in the Hawthorn and Bone Valley Formations are the products of more extensive reworking. Many marine phosphate deposits are composed of nodular or pelletal apatite which, by virtue of internal structure or texture or the petrography of its setting, can be ascribed to primary or early diagenetic origins.
