But if the whistle is ahead, it then becomes necessary to take extreme precautions. 5 There is no hard-and-fast rule that in a fog a vessel having warning of the proximity of another is not to alter her helm until the signals of the other give a clear indication of her direction. Each case must depend on its own circumstances; and these may afford reasonable ground for believing what the direction is. In The Martello, 7 the English and American courts were said to be in perfect accord with regard to the duty of a vessel hearing a horn blown in a fog. The law is thus expressed: 8 In The Kirby Hall, 9 it was held to be the duty of a steamship hearing the steam whistle of another steamship in close proximity, in a dense fog, but unable to ascertain her course and position, to stop and reverse her engines, so as to take all way off of her, and bring her to a standstill. So, in The John McIntyre 10 it was held that while the master of a steamship was not at once bound the moment he heard a whistle, wherever it might be, to stop and reverse his engines; yet, if in a dense fog he hears the 1 Also pwr Lord Watson, l. e. 686. 2 1901 P. 289. The Ebor, 11 P.
